In 2017, 4.5 percent (11.2 million) of Americans 18 years or older had a serious mental illness (SMI) and 6.8 to 11.5 percent of children and youth had a serious emotional disturbance (SED). Individuals with SMI often have multiple mental disorders, co-occurring substance use disorders, have a substantially elevated risk for suicide, and are at increased risk for homelessness and involvement with the criminal justice system. Acerbating this for certain segments of the population are racial discrimination and social exclusion; adverse early life experiences; poor education; unemployment, underemployment, and job insecurity; poverty, income inequality, and neighborhood deprivation; poor access to sufficient healthy food; poor housing quality and housing instability; and poor access to health care.

Mounting evidence indicates that early recognition and treatment of behavioral health disorders can prevent complications, improve quality of life, and help reduce health care costs. Yet only a fraction of individuals with these disorders receive the evidence-based care they need. Practitioners and all health care professionals need to understand not only how to prevent or treat disorders and to aid in recovery, but also ensure they are meeting the needs of patients and clients in an equitable manner.

The Institute will provide educational and training needs for multiple state agencies, private providers, clinicians, caregivers and other relevant stakeholders with a vested interest in addressing the intellectual, mental and behavioral health needs of the state. Sessions will promote individual, program, and system-level approaches that foster health, resilience and recovery; increase permanent housing, employment, education, and other necessary supports; and reduce barriers to equity and inclusion.

Speakers will address ways to build organizational partnerships; culturally-based services or competencies; recovery and recovery supports; and innovations that enhance family and community support. Topics also will cover person-centered planning and practices, prevention and treatment solutions and how they relate to youth, individuals and families, judicial (legal, court, incarceration), best business practices in skilled nursing facilities, and all populations impacted by mental health and substance use disorders.
